NEW QUESTION: 2 The U.S. Constitution does not explicitly give the power of judicial review to the Supreme Court. In fact, the court did not use this power - which gives it the authority to invalidate laws and executive actions if they conflict with the Constitution - until the 1803 case of Marbury v. Madison. In that case, Chief Justice John Marshall ruled that a statute was unconstitutional. He argued that judicial review was necessary if the court was to fulfill its duty of upholding the Constitution. Without it, he felt that the legislature would have a "real and practical omnipotence." Moreover, several of the Constitution's framers expected the court to act in this way. Alexander Hamilton and James Madison emphasized the importance of judicial review in the Federalist Papers, a series of essays promoting the adoption of the Constitution. However, the power of judicial review continues to be a controversial power because it allows the justices - who are appointed rather than elected - to overturn laws made by Congress and state lawmaking bodies. Which of the following best describes the purpose of judicial review?
A. to propose new laws
B. to determine the country's changing needs
C. to follow public opinion polls
D. to declare a law unconstitutional
E. to adapt the Constitution to what the court feels is right
