NEW QUESTION: 1Economies in which a high percentage of resources are invested in research and development show greater growth in the long run than do those in which resources are channeled into consumption. Japanese workers spend a higher percentage of their income investing in research and development than do American workers. To grow as fast as Japan has in the past three decades, the United States must change the tax code in order to encourage savings and investment and discourage debt. Which of the following, if true, tends to weaken the argument?
A. Proposed changes to the tax code could involve strict limits on the deductibility of interest, and increased allowance for research.
B. Studies have shown that countries with high consumption rates prosper in the short run.
C. Because a decreasing percentage of the United States is under 40, an age when savings are traditionally low, the savings rate will increase without changes to the tax code.
D. Japanese research is more focused on consumers than is research by American firms.
E. Class mobility, highly valued in American culture, is encouraged by a growing rather than a stagnant economy.
Answer: C

NEW QUESTION: 2Normally, it would be essential to involve which of the following stakeholders in the initiation stage of a project?
A. System designers
B. System owners
C. System builders
D. System users
Answer: B
Explanation: Explanation/Reference: Explanation:
System owners are the information systems (project) sponsors or chief advocates. They normally are responsible for initiating and funding projects to develop, operate and maintain information systems. System users are the individuals who use or are affected by the information system. Their requirements are crucial in the testing stage of a project. System designers translate business requirements and constraints into technical solutions. System builders construct the system based on the specifications from the systems designers. In most cases, the designers and builders are one and the same.
