Examples of these problems include the use of technical terms understood by only one side in the communication process, faulty channel selection, and interpersonal problems. To overcome these difficulties, the sender must encode the message in the context of the receiver's perceptions; that is, the sender must understand the receiver. The sender must establish an interpersonal climate that encourages the elimination of interpersonal barriers to communication. A performance appraisal prepared by the accountant's supervisor will not help the accountant understand the perceptions of people in other departments.
