Answer: A

NEW QUESTION: 3 Which definition describes the LIB on a Cisco router? A. a table that holds the next hop for destination prefixes B. a table used by switching functions to forward labeled packets C. a label-based adjacency table D. a table that stores remote and local label bindings
Answer: D Explanation: Explanation When LDP is enabled on a router, the router will assign a local label to each IP prefix in its routing table. This label/prefix mapping on the router is called a local binding. The router will then advertise this label and prefix mapping out to its neighbors. The router's LDP neighbors will also do the same with the prefixes in their own routing table and advertise the binding to their neighbors. The received label/prefix mapping from LDP neighbors then becomes remote bindings on the router. The local bindings and remote bindings are stored in the Label Information Base (LIB). We can view the LIB using the show mpls ldp bindings command.
