Indeed, decertification does not prevent employees from rejoining the same union in the future. Decertification is not always indicative of problems with the union. In some cases, a union will decertify because it has outgrown its usefulness, or because the workers wish to file suit against ownership without the interference of the union. Employers are not allowed to lobby employees during the decertification process, and only 30% of the employees need to petition the NLRB for there to be a decertification vote.
