NEW QUESTION: 1You have a web application running on six Amazon EC2 instances, consuming about 45% of resources on each instance. You are using auto-scaling to make sure that six instances are running at all times. The number of requests this application processes is consistent and does not experience spikes. The application is critical to your business and you want high availability at all times. You want the load to be distributed evenly between all instances. You also want to use the same Amazon Machine Image (AMI) for all instances. Which of the following architectural choices should you make?A. Deploy3 EC2 instances in one region and 3 in another region and use Amazon ElasticLoad Balancer.B. Deploy2 EC2 instances in three regions and use Amazon Elastic Load Balancer.C. Deploy3 EC2 instances in one availability zone and 3 in another availability zone and use Amazon Elastic Load Balancer.D. Deploy6 EC2 instances in one availability zone and use Amazon Elastic Load Balancer.Answer: C
Explanation:ExplanationOption A is automatically incorrect because remember that the question asks for high availability. For option A, if the A2 goes down then the entire application fails.For Option B and D, the CLB is designed to only run in one region in aws and not across multiple regions. So these options are wrong.The right option is C.The below example shows an Elastic Loadbalancer connected to 2 EC2 instances connected via Auto Scaling.This is an example of an elastic and scalable web tier.By scalable we mean that the Auto scaling process will increase or decrease the number of CC2 instances as required.For more information on best practices for AWS Cloud applications, please visit the below URL:.*
