Access to a registration authority (RA) is not required to check for bad certificates. A CRL will do fine.A registration authority (RA) offloads some of the work from a CA. An RA system operates as a middleman in the process: It can distribute keys, accept registrations for the CA, and validate identities.C. A verification authority is used to check the uniqueness of a certificate, not primarily to check for bad certificates.The user identity must be unique within each CA domain. The third-party validation authority (VA)/verification authority can provide this information on behalf of the CA. The binding is established through the registration and issuance process.D. A redundant CA is not required to check for bad certificates. A CRL will do fine.References:Dulaney, Emmett and Chuck Eastton, CompTIA Security+ Study Guide, 6th Edition, Sybex, Indianapolis, 2014, pp. 262,279-280, 285
