NEW QUESTION: 1 Which of the following best describes signature-based detection? A.

Compare source code, looking for events or sets of events that could cause damage to a system or network. B. Compare system activity for the behaviour patterns of new attacks. C. Compare network nodes looking for objects or sets of objects that match a predefined pattern of objects that may describe a known attack. D. Compare system activity, looking for events or sets of events that match a predefined pattern of events that describe a known attack. Answer: D

Explanation: Explanation/Reference: Misuse detectors compare system activity, looking for events or sets of events that match a predefined pattern of events that describe a known attack. As the patterns corresponding to known attacks are called signatures, misuse detection is sometimes called "signature-based detection." The most common form of misuse detection used in commercial products specifies each pattern of events corresponding to an attack as a separate signature. However, there are more sophisticated approaches to doing misuse detection (called "state-based" analysis techniques) that can leverage a single signature to detect groups of attacks.
