NEW QUESTION: 1 Which of the following statements about block level incremental backups (BLIB) is correct?
A. They can speed up backups of Exchange servers.
B. They can speed up backups of Oracle databases.
C. They enable restore of individual objects for Oracle.
D. They enable restore of individual objects for Exchange.
Answer: B
Explanation: Explanation Block level incremental backups (BLIB) backs up changed data for Oracle. This method does not apply to Exchange.

NEW QUESTION: 2 Your customer tells you that in their industry, the response document for an auction is called a "Proposal" instead of the default Oracle term "Bid", and that they would like to have all their negotiation documents reflect this terminology. What would you do to meet this requirement?
A. Create a Negotiation Style.
B. Customize the Descriptive Flexfield.
C. Create a Purchasing Document Style.
D. Create a Negotiation Template.
E. Create a Negotiation Type.
Answer: A
Explanation: Explanation/Reference: You can use a negotiation style to control the look of the document and the features available. A style is a good way to create a streamlined negotiation. Incorrect Answers: A: Use descriptive flexfields to add custom attributes to business object entities, and define validation for them. All the business object entities that you can use in the application are enabled for descriptive flexfields. However, configuring descriptive flexfields is an optional task. C: You can use a negotiation template to create a base negotiation document containing much of the line and supplier-related information. Once you have a template defined, you can reuse it without having to reenter negotiation information. D: Purchase order document styles allow organizations to control the look and feel of the purchasing document, not the negotiation document, in the application to match its business usage. Through reusable document styles, organizations can turn on or off various procurement features, thereby simplifying the user interface. In addition, document styles provide the ability to define purchasing document names that align more closely with the naming conventions of your organization's business. E: Negotiation Type is one of the following: Auction, RFQ, RFI. References: Oracle Procurement Cloud Using Procurement (Release 9), Page 212
