NEW QUESTION: 3Which of the following is the most reliable authentication method for remote access?A. Fixed callback system*B. Variable callback system*C. Combination of callback and caller ID*D. Synchronous token*Answer: D*Explanation:Explanation/Reference:A Synchronous token generates a one-time password that is only valid for a short period of time. Once the password is used it is no longer valid, and it expires if not entered in the acceptable time frame.The following answers are incorrect:Variable callback system. Although variable callback systems are more flexible than fixed callback systems, the system assumes the identity of the individual unless two-factor authentication is also implemented. By itself, this method might allow an attacker access as a trusted user.Fixed callback system. Authentication provides assurance that someone or something is who or what he/it is supposed to be. Callback systems authenticate a person, but anyone can pretend to be that person.They are tied to a specific place and phone number, which can be spoofed by implementing call-forwarding.Combination of callback and Caller ID. The caller ID and callback functionality provides greater confidence and auditability of the caller's identity. By disconnecting and calling back only authorized phone numbers, the system has a greater confidence in the location of the call. However, unless combined with strong authentication, any individual at the location could obtain access.The following reference(s) were/was used to create this question:Shon Harris AIO v3 p. 140, 548ISC2 OIG 2007 p. 152-153, 126-127
