Answer: E

NEW QUESTION: 2A systems administrator at a company notices an unknown, randomly named process running on a database server that contains several terabytes of personal and account data for customers. Reviewing the server, the administrator notices the process was installed and began running two days ago. Database logs stored off the server indicate unusual queries were run but not against tables containing personal and account data. Network logs show encrypted network traffic at minimal levels to an external IP address that began shortly after the process started and ended at midnight yesterday when the threat intelligence feed automatically blocked the IP address. Which of the following is the BEST course of action?
A. Kill the process, delete it from the server to prevent it from spreading, and restore a backup of the server.
B. Leave the process running and remove the network block, allowing the administrator to study the process and determine its purpose.
C. Contact all customers with records in the database to let them know their information may have been compromised.
D. Kill the process, quarantine the server, and begin examining the logs of other devices to which this server has connectivity.
