NEW QUESTION: 3In which phase of Internet Key Exchange (IKE) protocol is peer authentication performed?A. Phase 2B. Phase 1C. Pre Initialization PhaseD. No peer authentication is performedAnswer: BExplanation:Explanation/Reference:The Internet Key Exchange (IKE) protocol is a key management protocol standard that is used in conjunction with the IPSec standard. IKE enhances IPSec by providing additional features, flexibility, and ease of configuration for the IPSec standard. IPSec can however, be configured without IKE by manually configuring the gateways communicating with each other for example.A security association (SA) is a relationship between two or more entities that describes how the entities will use security services to communicate securely.In phase 1 of this process, IKE creates an authenticated, secure channel between the two IKE peers, called the IKE security association. The Diffie-Hellman key agreement is always performed in this phase.In phase 2 IKE negotiates the IPSec security associations and generates the required key material for IPSec. The sender offers one or more transform sets that are used to specify an allowed combination of transforms with their respective settings.Benefits provided by IKE include:Eliminates the need to manually specify all the IPSec security parameters in the crypto maps at both peers.Allows you to specify a lifetime for the IPSec security association.Allows encryption keys to change during IPSec sessions.Allows IPSec to provide anti-replay services.Permits Certification Authority (CA) support for a manageable, scalable IPSec implementation.Allows dynamic authentication of peers.
