NEW QUESTION: 1 The SYN flood attack sends TCP connections requests faster than a machine can process them.- Attacker creates a random source address for each packet - SYN flag set in each packet is a request to open a new connection to the server from the spoofed IP address - Victim responds to spoofed IP address, then waits for confirmation that neverarrives (timeout wait is about 3 minutes) - Victim's connection table fills up waiting for replies and ignores new connections - Legitimate users are ignored and will not be able to access the serverHow do you protect your network against SYN Flood attacks?A. Micro Blocks. Instead of allocating a complete connection, simply allocate a micro record of 16-bytes for the incoming SYN objectB. SYN cookies. Instead of allocating a record, send a SYN-ACK with a carefully constructed sequence number generated as a hash of the clients IP address, port number, and other information. When the client responds with a normal ACK, that special sequence number will be included, which the server then verifies. Thus, the server first allocates memory on the third packet of the handshake, not the first.C. RST cookies - The server sends a wrong SYN/ACK back to the client. The client should then generate a RST packet telling the server that something is wrong. At this point, the server knows the client is valid and will now accept incoming connections from that client normallyD. Stack Tweaking. TCP stacks can be tweaked in order to reduce the effect of SYN floods. Reduce the timeout before a stack frees up the memory allocated for a connectionE. Check the incoming packet's IP address with the SPAM database on the Internet and enable the filter using ACLs at the FirewallAnswer: A,B,C,D
