NEW QUESTION: 2You administer a SQL Server 2008 instance that hosts a large database. The following backup strategy is used for the database: A full database backup is performed at 02:00 hr every Monday. A differential backup is performed at 23:00 hr every day. A transaction log backup is performed on an hourly basis. A power failure on Thursday causes the SQL Server 2008 server to restart at 09:15 hr. Fifteen minutes after the server restarts, the users report that they are unable to execute certain queries that access customer data. You discover that the customer data is unmodified after the power failure. When you execute the DBCC CHECKDB command on the database, you receive the following error message: Object ID 2814307832, index ID 2, partition ID 83127819437122157, alloc unit ID 82134587923221126 (type In-row data): Page (3421:169) could not be processed. Since the clustered index on a table is always index 1, this means there's a problem with the nonclustered index. Dropping and recreating this may fix the seek issue quickly as indicated in the requirements. In situations such as this, it's always a better idea to restore from backups. There's no way of telling how bad the damage is. However, to get the database running as quickly as possible, D) is the immediate solution. Any steps taken after that aren't relevant.
