NEW QUESTION: 1 You have been asked to design and deploy a VPN-based backup network for your enterprise. Your network is currently configured across a single OSPF Area 0. All the VPN termination points in your network will be Juniper Networks SRX Series devices. How must you configure your devices so that static routing can be avoided? A. Because OSPF will not provide the required next-hop VPN binding alone, dynamic VPN must be used to discover the next-hop tunnel binding automatically. B. OSPF will not provide the needed functionality. The group VPN feature is required to create the next-hop tunnel binding and arrange key management across routing domains. C. Configure VPN tunnels between the SRX Series devices and enable OSPF Area 0 on the st.0 interfaces. You must configure next-hop tunnel binding for the remote peers mapping next hops to VPN names. D. Configure VPN tunnels between the SRX Series devices and enable OSPF Area 0 on the st.0 interfaces. You can use the next-hop tunnel binding (NHTB) protocol for next hops to the tunnels. Answer: D Explanation: Point-to-multipoint VPNs allow you to bind multiple VPNs to a single interface on the hub. For this to work properly, the SRX must know not only which VPN to send the traffic into on the st0 interface to which it is bound, but also which next-hop will be used for routing that traffic on the interface. To accomplish this, the SRX uses a mechanism called a Next-Hop Tunnel Binding (NHTB) table on the interface to map all of this information. On the SRX, if you are going to another SRX or ScreenOS device and you are using static routing, the SRX can automatically exchange the next-hop tunnel information with the peer as part of the optional vendor attribute exchanges in Phase 2 (also known as auto NHTB). If you are using a dynamic routing protocol (such as RIP, OSPF, or BGP), you will not need to make a manual mapping entry because the SRX can build the table automatically from the routing updates matching the next-hop to the tunnel it came out of.
