NEW QUESTION: 3 A Differential backup process will:
A. Backs up data labeled with archive bit 0 and changes the data label to archive bit 1
B. Backs up data labeled with archive bit 0 and leaves the data labeled as archive bit 0
C. Backs up data labeled with archive bit 1 and leaves the data labeled as archive bit 1
D. Backs up data labeled with archive bit 1 and changes the data label to archive bit 0
Answer: C
Explanation: Archive bit 1 = On (the archive bit is set).
Archive bit 0 = Off (the archive bit is NOT set).
When the archive bit is set to ON, it indicates a file that has changed and needs to be backed up. Differential backups backup all files changed since the last full. To do this, they don't change the archive bit value when they backup a file. Instead the differential let's the full backup make that change. An incremental only backs up data since the last incremental backup. Thus it does change the archive bit from 1 (On) to 0 (Off).
The following answers are incorrect:
Backs up data labeled with archive bit 1 and changes the data label to archive bit 0 - This is the behavior of an incremental backup, not a differential backup.
Backs up data labeled with archive bit 0 and leaves the data labeled as archive bit 0 - If the archive bit is set to 0 (Off), it will only be backed up via a Full backup. Everything else will ignore it.
Backs up data labeled with archive bit 0 and changes the data label to archive bit 1 - If the archive bit is set to 0 (Off), it will only be backed up via a Full backup. Everything else will ignore it.
