Whether a past event results in a present obligation is usually clear. Thus, it is clear from the circumstances that the entity's sale of goods without warranty is an obligating event that resulted in a present obligation for the issuance of warranty costs. Recognition of provisions is appropriate when the entity has a legal or constructive present obligation resulting from a past event (called an obligating event), it is probable that an outflow of economic benefits will be necessary to settle the obligation, and its amount can be reliably estimated. Assuming that the amount of warranty costs can be reliably estimated all though they are uncertain in timing and amount compared with a trade payable, for example) and that the outflow is probable in these circumstances, "more likely than not"), the manufacturer's contractual present obligating should result in recognition of a provision.
