NEW QUESTION: 1 Another type of access control is lattice-based access control. In this type of control a lattice model is applied. How is this type of access control concept applied?A. The pair of elements is the subject and object, and the subject has an upper bound equal or higher than the upper bound of the object being accessed.B. The pair of elements is the subject and object, and the subject has no access rights in relation to an object.C. The pair of elements is the subject and object, and the subject has an upper bound lower than the upper bound of the object being accessed.D. The pair of elements is the subject and object, and the subject has no special upper or lower bound needed within the lattice.Answer: A
Explanation: In this type of control, a lattice model is applied. To apply this concept to access control, the pair of elements is the subject and object, and the subject has to have an upper bound equal or higher than the object being accessed. WIKIPEDIA has a great explanation as well: In computer security, lattice-based access control (LBAC) is a complex access control based on the interaction between any combination of objects (such as resources, computers, and applications) and subjects (such as individuals, groups or organizations). In this type of label-based mandatory access control model, a lattice is used to define the levels of security that an object may have and that a subject may have access to. The subject is only allowed to access an object if the security level of the subject is greater than or equal to that of the object.
