NEW QUESTION: 1Entry into a new business may be made by acquisition. The analysis differs from that for entry by internal development. A key point is that prices are set in the market for acquisitions. Accordingly, a buyer should most likely expect to make above- average profits when theA. Buyer adopts a sequential entry strategy.B. Seller can choose to continue operating the business.C. Market is active and well organized.D. Market for acquisitions is imperfect.

Answer: DExplanation:Acquisitions are more likely to earn above-average profits when the expected present value to the seller of continuing operations is low, e.g., because the seller needs funds, has capital limits, or has management weaknesses. Above-average profits also are more likely when the market for acquisitions is imperfect. For example, (1) the buyer may have better information, (2) there are few bidders, (3) the economy is weak, (4) the seller is weak, or (5) the seller has reasons to sell other than profit maximization. Moreover, the buyer may have a unique ability to operate the seller.
