NEW QUESTION: 2 How does the IBM Storwize native IP replication provide optimal utilization of the IP network?A. It uses Real-time Compression of data prior to replication.B. It uses artificial intelligence and sends multiple parallel streams.C. It utilizes intelligent switches in the network to minimize latency.D. It communicates with external WAN Optimization devices to achieve maximum efficiency.Answer: BExplanation:Explanation/Reference:The native Internet Protocol (IP) replication feature enables replication between any SVC/Storwize family member running code version 7.2 or higher, using the built-in networking ports of the cluster nodes. Following a recent partnership with IBM, it uses SANslide technology developed by Bridgeworks Limited of Christchurch, UK. They specialize in products that can bridge storage protocols and accelerate data transfer over long distances.Adding this technology at each end of a wide area network (WAN) Transmission Control Protocol/Internet Protocol (TCP/IP) link significantly improves the usage of the link. It does this by applying patented Artificial Intelligence (AI) to hide latency normally associated with WANs.The technology built into the SVC/Storwize code uses TCP/IP latency to its advantage.Rather than wait for the acknowledgment to come back, it sends more sets of packets across other virtual connections. The number of virtual connections is controlled by the AI engine.This improves WAN connection use, which results in a data transfer rate approaching full line speed.References: IBM SAN Volume Controller and Storwize Family Native IP Replication, page 8 http://www.redbooks.ibm.com/redpapers/pdfs/redp5103.pdf
