Explanation: ( richtig !! import java.nio.file.Path; import java.nio.file.Paths; ) original-Aufgabe war ( falsch >> import java.io.file.Path; import java.io.file.Paths; )
The relativize method that can be used to construct a relative path between two paths. relativize Path relativize(Path other) Constructs a relative path between this path and a given path. Parameters: other - the path to relativize against this path Returns: the resulting relative path, or an empty path if both paths are equal Note: Relativization is the inverse of resolution. This method attempts to construct a relative path that when resolved against this path, yields a path that locates the same file as the given path. For example, on UNIX, if this path is "/a/b" and the given path is "/a/b/c/d" then the resulting relative path would be "c/d". Where this path and the given path do not have a root component, then a relative path can be constructed. A relative path cannot be constructed if only one of the paths have a root component. Where both paths have a root component then it is implementation dependent if a relative path can be constructed. If this path and the given path are equal then an empty path is returned. For any two normalized paths p and q, where q does not have a root component, p.relativize(p.resolve(q)).equals(q) When symbolic links are supported, then whether the resulting path, when resolved against this path, yields a path that can be used to locate the same file as other is implementation dependent. For example, if this path is "/a/b" and the given path is "/a/x" then the resulting relative path may be "../x". If "b" is a symbolic link then it is implementation dependent if "a/b/../x" would locate the same file as "/a/x".
