NEW QUESTION: 1 Consider the validation code in a Shipping entity object that is designed to ensure that the date ordered is \leq the date shipped.

public boolean validateDateShippedAfterDateOrdered() {Date DateShipped = getDateShipped();Date DateOrdered = getDateOrdered();if (DateShipped != null && DateShipped.compareTo(DateOrdered) < 0) {return false;}return true;}Which entity object validation rule should you integrate this with? (Choose the best answer.)A. method validator on the Shipping entity objectB. compare validator on the DateOrdered attributeC. method validator on the DateShipped attributeD. compare validator on the DateShipped attributeE. range validator on the Shipping entity objectAnswer: B
Explanation: Explanation/Reference: Explanation: If the validity of one attribute is dependent on one or more other attributes, enforce this rule using entity validation, not attribute validation. Examples of when you would want to do this include the following: You have a Compare validator that compares one attribute to another. You have an attribute with an expression validator that examines the value in another attribute to control branching in the expression to validate the attribute differently depending on the value in this other attribute. You make use of conditional execution, and your precondition expression involves an attribute other than the one that you are validating.
