NEW QUESTION: 1 Which type of ROWID does Oracle use for global indexes on partitioned tables? A. extended B. restricted C. local Answer: A

NEW QUESTION: 2 Which two statements describe the characteristics of an application module? (Choose two.) A. Each ADF application has only one application module. B. It defines entity object instances to implement an application use case. C. It defines view object instances to implement an application use case. D. There is a one-to-one mapping between view objects and application modules. E. It provides the database transaction for the queries that it encapsulates. Answer: C, E
Explanation: Explanation/Reference: A: In general, one application module instance owns a single database transaction. All changes made through that instance are made in a single transaction, which can be rolled back or committed at any time. B: Oracle ADF application modules are business components that represent particular application tasks. The application module provides a data model for the task by aggregating the view object and view link instances required for the task. It also provides services that help the client accomplish the task. For example, an application module can represent and assist with tasks such as: Updating customer information Creating a new order Processing salary increases
Incorrect Answers: D: An application module contains view object instances that retrieve the data needed by the client, as well as view link instances that specify the relationships between the view object instances. The view object and view link instances can be represented by a tree, called the application module's data model. References:
