All bits are of equal importance and are anticipated to occur at regular time intervals. * asynchronous, is a data transmission method using a start bit at the beginning of the data value, and a stop bit at the end of the value. * synchronous, is a message framed transmission method that uses clocking pulses to match the speed of the data transmission. * pleisiochronous, is a transmission method that uses more than one timing source, sometimes running at different speeds. This method may require master and slave clock devices. Source: Communications Systems and Networks by Ray Horak (M&T Books, 2000).
