NEW QUESTION: 1 Which is a correct way to define a runtime exception as an EJB 3.x application exception?
A. public class MyAppException extends javax.ejb.EJBException
B. @ApplicationException public class MyAppException extends javax.ejb.EJBException
C. @ApplicationException public class MyAppException extends javax.lang.EJBException
D. public class MyAppException extends javax.lang.EJBException
Answer: B
Explanation: Use the @javax.ejb.ApplicationException annotation to specify that an exception class is an application exception thrown by a business method of the EJB. The EJB container reports the exception directly to the client in the event of the application error.
Note: java.lang.Object java.lang.Throwable java.lang.Exception java.lang.RuntimeException
javax.ejb.EJBException
javax.ejb public class EJBException extends java.lang.RuntimeException
The EJBException is thrown to report that the invoked business method or callback method could not be completed because of an unexpected error (e.g. the instance failed to open a database connection).
Example: The following ProcessingException.java file shows how to use the @ApplicationException annotation to specify that an exception class is an application exception thrown by one of the business methods of the EJB:
package examples; import javax.ejb.ApplicationException; /** * Application exception class thrown when there was a processing error * with a business method of the EJB. Annotated with the * @ApplicationException annotation. */ @ApplicationException() public class ProcessingException extends Exception {
