The answer is 23. Thus, trying $2^{m/2}$ possible trial inputs to a hash function gives a 50% chance of finding two inputs that have the same hash value. Answer a, describes an attack in which the attacker can choose the plaintext to be encrypted and can modify his/her choice based on the results of a previous encryption.* Answer the chosen-cipher text attack is where the attacker can select different ciphertexts to be decrypted and has the decrypted plaintext available. This attack is used to determine the key or keys being used. Answer d is an attack against double encryption. This approach shows that for a key length of k bits, a chosen-plaintext attack could find the key after 2^{k+1} trials instead of 2^{2k} attempts. In this attack on double encryption, one encrypts from one end, decrypts from the other and compares the results in-the-middle.
