NEW QUESTION: 1 Which option best describes RPL? A. RPL stands for Routing over low priority links that use link-state LSAs to determine the best route between two root border routers. B. RPL stands for Routing over low priority links that use distance vector DOGAG to determine the best route between two root border routers. C. RPL stands for Routing over Low-power Lossy Networks that use link-state LSAs to determine the best route between leaves and the root border router. D. RPL stands for Routing over Low-power Lossy Networks that use distance vector DOGAG to determine the best route leaves and the root border router. Answer: D
Explanation: Explanation/Reference: Explanation: RPL is a distance vector protocol and supports a wide set of routing link and node metrics. RPL supports mono metric optimization-the best path is considered as the shortest (constrained) path according to a single metric (multimetric optimization is not supported). The objective is to not trade path optimality for network stability. A small path cost increase is usually smoothed out for the benefit of limiting the control plane traffic.

NEW QUESTION: 2 What command is used to permanently set the options in the kernel when making a boot disk? A. lilo B. kconfig C. dd D. rdev E. blockdev Answer: D Explanation: System administration command. If invoked with no arguments, show the current root filesystem in /etc/mtab syntax. Otherwise, change the values in the kernel image that specify the RAM disk size (by default located at decimal byte offset 504 in the kernel), VGA mode (default 506), and root device (default 508). You must specify the kernel image to be changed, and may specify a new value and a different offset. Using rdev to change these values directly in an image file is discouraged. These values can all be set by a boot loader such as lilo or grub. Options: -r Behave like ramsize. -v Behave like vidmode. -R Behave like rootflags
