NEW QUESTION: 3 HOTSPOT In the image of the Screened Host Firewall Architecture given below, select the element that is commonly known as the access router.
Hot Area: Answer:
Explanation: Explanation/Reference: Explanation: An access router is the common name of the exterior router present in the screened host firewall architecture. It is attached to the perimeter network and the Internet. An access router is used to protect both the perimeter network and the internal network from the Internet. It allows anything that is outbound from the perimeter network. Access routers seldom do packet filtering. The rules for packet filtering regarding the protection of internal machines are always the same on both the interior router and the exterior router. A Screened Host Firewall Architecture is used to provide services from a host that is attached only to the internal network by using a separate router. In this type of firewall architecture, the key security is provided by packet filtering. The host exists in the internal network. The packet filtering on the screening router is configured in such a way that the bastion host is the only system in the internal network that is open to the Internet connections. If any external system tries to access internal systems or services, then it will connect only to this host. The bastion host therefore needs to be at a high level of security.
