(Choose the best answer.) A. Create services for the applications and set the relative priority of services within an instance by mapping the services directly to consumer groups. B. Create services for the applications and set a relative priority by assigning them to application users and using the DBMS_MONITOR.SESSION_TRACE_ENABLE procedure to trace the services. C. Create services for the applications and set a relative priority by assigning them to application users. D. Create services for the applications and set a relative priority by assigning them to application users and using the DBMS_MONITOR.SERV_MOD_ACT_TRACE_ENABLE procedure to trace the services. Answer: D

He is also designing an IBM Web Experience Factory application to consume them and plans to use Web Experience Factory's Paging features to paginate over the large record sets. How should paging be configured for the web services? A. Jose should consider implementing a start index and fetch size parameter in his underlying web services that return large record sets. Then in Web Experience Factory he can implement the DataRetriever interface which enables the Paging Assistant builder to return "chunks" from the underlying service rather than marshalling the entire record set into the application server's memory. B. He should use enable the Web Service Call to return a DataRetriever and then add a Paging Assistant builder and point to the variable created by the results of the web service call. C. He should simply enable paging in the Data Column Modifier builder. Web Experience Factory automatically chunks the data from the backend web service into the app server memory. D. He should consider using The Chunked Data Retriever builder, which allows you to specify a start index and fetch size before invoking a web service. Answer: A
