NEW QUESTION: 2The 35-millimeter (mm) format became the standard for movie production around 1913. The mid-1920sthrough the mid-1930s, however, saw a resurgence of wide-film (55-mm to 70-mm) formats. Developmentthen slackened until the 1950s, when widescreen film-making came back in direct response to the erosionof box office receipts resulting from the rising popularity of television. This new era saw another flurry ofspecialized formats, including Cinema-Scope and, in 1956, Camera 65, which Panavision developed forMGM Studios and which was first used to film Raintree Country. Panavision soon contributed another key technical advance, spherical 65mm lenses, which eliminated the "fat faces" syndrome that had plaguedCinemaScope films. Though many films were made in widescreen formats during this period, these formats flounderedbecause of expense, unwieldy cameras, and slow film stocks and lenses. After the invention of a set of3 5-mm anamorphic lenses, which could be used to squeeze a widescreen image onto theatrical screens,film technology improved to the point where quality 70-mm prints could be enlarged from 35-mmnegatives.It can be inferred from the passage that wide-film formats were
A. in use before 1913
B. more widely used during the 1920s than during the 1930s
C. not used after 1956
D. more widely used for some types of movies than for others
E. not used during the 1940s
Answer: A
Explanation:The passage refers to the establishment of a 35-mm standard around 1913, followed by a "resurgence" ofwide-film formats (in the mid-1920s to the mid-1930s). This resurgence suggests that wide-film formats were not new because they had been used before the 35-mm standard was established; that is, before1 913.
