NEW QUESTION: 1Your application's Auto Scaling Group scales up too quickly, too much, and stays scaled when traffic decreases. What should you do to fix this?A. Set a longer cooldown period on the Group, so the system stops overshooting the target capacity. The issue is that the scaling system doesn't allow enough time for new instances to begin servicing requests before measuring aggregate load again.B. Raise the CloudWatch Alarms threshold associated with your autoscaling group, so the scaling takes more of an increase in demand before beginning.C. Calculate the bottleneck or constraint on the compute layer, then select that as the new metric, and set the metric thresholds to the bounding values that begin to affect response latency.D. Use larger instances instead of lots of smaller ones, so the Group stops scaling out so much and wasting resources as the OS level, since the OS uses a higher proportion of resources on smaller instances.Answer: CExplanation:ExplanationThe ideal case is that the right metric is not being used for the scale up and down.Option A is not valid because it mentions that the cooldown is not happening when the traffic decreases, that means the metric threshold for the scale down is not occurring in CloudwatchOption C is not valid because increasing the Cloudwatch alarm metric will not ensure that the instances scaledown when the traffic decreases.Option D is not valid because the question does not mention any constraints that points to the instance size. For an example on using custom metrics for scaling in and out, please follow the below link for a use case.*
