NEW QUESTION: 2A customer has these servers in their IT environment..1 Exchange server .6 SQL database servers .5 file servers .16 application serversThe customer is using an HP StoreOnce Backup System to back up their data. To achieve the best deduplication ratio/performance compromise, how many virtual libraries should be created?A. 0B. 1C. 2D. 3

Answer: DExplanation:

<http://www.manualslib.com/manual/484560/Hewlett-Packard-D2d.html?page=7>Key factors for performance considerations with deduplication:The inline nature of the deduplication process means that there will always be someperformance trade-off for the benefits of increased disk space utilization.With each Virtual Library or NAS Share created there is an associated dedicateddeduplication store. If Globaldeduplication across all backups is required, this will onlyhappen if a single virtual library or NAS share is configured and all backups are sent to it.The best deduplication ratio will be achieved by configuring a minimum number of libraries/shares. Best performance will be gained by configuring a larger number of libraries/shares and optimising for individual deduplication store complexity.If servers with lots of similar data are to be backed up, a higher deduplication ratio can beachieved by backing them all up to the same library/share. If servers contain dissimilar datatypes, the best deduplication ratio/performance compromise will be achieved by groupingservers with similar data types together into their own dedicated libraries/shares.For example, a requirement to back up a set of exchange servers, SQL database servers,file servers and application servers would be best served by creating four virtual libraries orNAS shares; one for each server set. When restoring data from a deduplicating device it must reconstruct the original un-deduplicated data stream from all of the data chunks. This can result in lower performancethan that of the backup.Full backup jobs will result in higher deduplication ratios and better restore performance(because only one piece of media is needed for a full restore). Incremental and differentialbackups will not deduplicate as well
