NEW QUESTION: 1The role of the following VLANs is incorrect:A. Improve the robustness of the networkB. Isolated broadcast domainC. Enhance network securityD. Increase physical switch interface bandwidthAnswer: D

NEW QUESTION: 2Take a very commonplace, often discussed and critical topic: Are we detecting a greenhouse effect, and related to this, is it exacerbated by "homogenic factors," i.e., human actions? Most would be inclined to give a positive answer to both of these questions. But, if pushed, what would be the evidence, and how well grounded would it be for such affirmations?Within scientific communities and associated scientifically informed circles, the answers have to be somewhat more ambiguous, particularly when rigorous questions concerning evidence are raised. Were scientific truth to be a matter of consensus, and some argue that scientific truth often turns out to be just that, then it is clear that there is beginning to be a kind of majority consensus among many earth science practitioners that the temperature of the Earth, particularly of the oceans, is indeed rising and that this is a crucial indicator for a possible greenhouse effect. Most of these scientists admit that the mean oceanic temperature has risen globally in the last several decades. But this generalization depends upon how accurate measurements may be, not just for samples, but also for the whole Earth. Hot spots, for example the now four year old hot spot near New Guinea which is part of the El Niño cycle, does not count by itself because it might be balanced by cold spots elsewhere. And the fact of the matter is that "whole earth measurements" are still rare and primitive in the simple sense that we simply do not have enough thermometers out. Secondly, even if we had enough thermometers, a simply synchronic whole earth measurement over three decades is but a blip in the diachronic history of ice age cycles over the last tens of thousands of years. Thirdly, even if we know that the earth is now heating up, has an ever increasing ozone hole, and from this strange weather effects can be predicted, how much of this is due to homogenic factors, such as CFCs, CO2 increases, hydrocarbon burning, and the like? Is it really the case, as Science magazine claimed in 1990, "24% of greenhouse encouraging gases are of homogenic origin"?It can be inferred from the passage thatA. If the temperature of the oceans has ceased to rise at an ever-increasing rate, then the rate of global warming has increased.B. The greenhouse effect is the most widely discussed topic in the scientifically informed circles.C. Strange weather effects have been shown to be due to the diachronic effects of hydrocarbon burning and not to increases in CFC.D. We cannot be certain that strange weather effects are a result of the earth heating up and an ever- increasing ozone hole.E. Strange weather effects are caused by the increase use of CFCs, CO2, and similar gasses.Answer: DExplanation:

Explanation/Reference:Explanation:The author is questioning the cause and effect relationship between the increasingly large ozone hole and global warming, as well as cause and effect relationship between global warming and strange weather effects
