NEW QUESTION: 1 Testlet: Humongous Insurance You need to recommend a strategy for using managed service accounts on the Web servers Which managed service accounts should you recommend? Humon1 (exhibit): Humon2 (exhibit): A. One account for the parent domain and one account for each child domain. B. One account for each web server. C. One account for the parent domain and one account for both child domains. D. One account for all the web servers. Answer: B Explanation: there are 5 web servers in total, 3 in the forest root domain and 1 in each child domain. Service Account Vulnerability The practice of configuring services to use domain accounts for authentication leads to potential security exposure. The degree of risk exposure is dependent on various factors, including: The number of servers that have services that are configured to use service accounts. The vulnerability profile of a network increases for every server that has domain account authenticated services that run on that server. The existence of each such server increases the odds that an attacker might compromise that server, which can be used to escalate privileges to other resources on a network. The scope of privileges for any given domain account that services use. The larger the scope of privileges that a service account has, the greater the number of resources that can be compromised by that account. Domain administrator level privileges are a particularly high risk, because the scope of vulnerability for such accounts includes any computer on the network, including the domain controllers. Because such accounts have administrative privileges to all member servers, the compromise of such an account would be severe and all computers and data in the domain would be suspect. The number of services configured to use domain accounts on any given server. Some services have unique vulnerabilities, which make them somewhat more susceptible to attacks. Attackers will usually attempt to exploit known vulnerabilities first. Use of a domain account by a vulnerable service presents an escalated risk to other systems, which could have otherwise been isolated to a single server. The number of domain accounts that are used to run services in a domain. Monitoring and managing the security of service accounts requires more diligence than ordinary user accounts, and each additional domain account in use by services only complicates administration of those accounts. Given that administrators and security administrators need to know where each service account is used to detect suspicious activity highlights the need to minimize the number of those accounts. The preceding factors lead to several possible vulnerability scenarios that can exist, each with a different level of potential security risk. The following diagram and table describe these scenarios. For these examples it is assumed that the service accounts are domain accounts and each account has at least one service on each server using it for authentication. The following information describes the domain accounts shown in the following figure. Account A has Administrator-equivalent privileges to more than one domain controller. Account B has administrator-equivalent privileges on all member servers. Account C has Administrator-equivalent privileges on servers 2 and 3. Account D has Administrator-equivalent privileges on servers 4 and 5. Account E has Administrator-equivalent privileges on a single member server only.
