NEW QUESTION: 1When applying the cost-benefit approach to a decision, the primary criterion is how well management goals will be achieved in relation to costs. Costs include all expected.A. Future costs that differ among the alternative courses of action plus all qualitative factors that cannot be measured in numerical terms.B. Variable costs for the courses of action but not expected fixed costs because only the expected variable costs are relevant.C. Incremental out-of-pocket costs as well as all expected continuing costs that are common to all the alternative courses of action.D. Historical and future costs relative to the courses of action including all qualitative factors that cannot be measured in numerical terms.Answer: A
Explanation: The analysis of a make-or-buy decision is based on relevant costs. If costs do not vary with the option chosen they are irrelevant. Moreover, the decision may be based on non quantitative factors, for example, the desire to maintain a relationship with a vendor or to assume control over development of a product. A business needs a computer application that can be either Other related data follows Computer time is charged using developed internally or purchased. Suitable software from a predetermined rates The organization has sufficient excess vendor costs US $29,000. Minor modifications and testing can be conducted by the systems staff as part of their regular workload. If the software is developed internally, a systems analyst would be assigned full time, and a contractor would assume the analyst's responsibilities. The hourly rate for the regular analyst is US $25. The hourly rate for the contractor is US $22. The contractor would occupy an empty office. The office has 100 square feet, and occupancy cost is US $45 per square foot computer capacity for either software development or modification/testing of the purchase software.
