NEW QUESTION: 1 A developer wants to create an enterprise bean that uses the EJB Timer service. Which two are true? (Choose two.) A. Once created, a timer cannot be canceled. B. Once created, the timer will survive a container crash. C. The enterprise bean must implement the TimedObject interface. D. The bean can be used within a transaction. E. The developer can use either a message-driven bean, stateless session bean, or stateful session bean. Answer: B,D Explanation: Explanation/Reference: B: An enterprise bean usually creates a timer within a transaction. If this transaction is rolled back, the timer creation also is rolled back. Similarly, if a bean cancels a timer within a transaction that gets rolled back, the timer cancellation is rolled back. C: Timers are persistent by default. If the server is shut down or crashes, persistent timers are saved and will become active again when the server is restarted. If a persistent timer expires while the server is down, the container will call the @Timeout method when the server is restarted. Incorrect answers: A: Timers can be cancelled by the following events. * When a single-event timer expires, the EJB container calls the associated timeout method and then cancels the timer. * When the bean invokes the cancel method of the Timer interface, the container cancels the timer. Reference: The Java EE 6 Tutorial.
