NEW QUESTION: 1 Consider the following diagram using the Implementation and Migration extension: Which of the following statements correctly describes the concepts shown in the diagram?
A. Business processes
B. Plateau and deliverables
C. Work packages
D. Project components
Answer: C

NEW QUESTION: 2 Which type of variables in RiskWatch configuration files may be modified within the application after RiskWatch has been launched?
A. variables defining attribute lists
B. variables of the Boolean data type
C. variables of primitive data types
D. variables of enumerations
Answer: B

NEW QUESTION: 3 Your company is designing its network. The network will use an IPv6 prefix of 2001:DB8:BBCC:0000::/53. You need to identify an IPv6 addressing scheme that will support 2,000 subnets. Which network mask should you use?
A. /63
B. /61
C. /62
D. /64
Answer: D
Explanation: IPv6 also uses subnets, but the subnet ID is built into the address. In an IPv6 address, the first 48 bits are the network prefix. The next 16 bits are the subnet ID and are used for defining subnets. The last 64 bits are the interface identifier (which is also known as the Interface ID or the Device ID). If necessary, the bits that are normally reserved for the Device ID can be used for additional subnet masking. However, this is normally not necessary, as using a 16-bit subnet and a 64-bit device ID provides for 65,535 subnets with quintillions of possible device IDs per subnet. Reference:

<http://www.techrepublic.com/blog/10things/10-things-you-should-know-about-ipv6addressing/1893> Any of the other network masks would simply increase the # of available networks (each with 65,535 subnets available) in IPv6. We are only being asked to support 2,000 subnets in 1 network.
