NEW QUESTION: 1 There have been concerns in your network that the wireless network component is not sufficiently secure. You perform a vulnerability scan of the wireless network and find that it is using an old encryption protocol that was designed to mimic wired encryption, what encryption protocol is being used?A. RADIUSB. WPAC. WPA3D. WEPAnswer: DExplanation:Wired Equivalent Privacy (WEP) may be a security protocol, laid out in the IEEE wireless local area network (Wi-Fi) standard, 802.11b, that's designed to supply a wireless local area network (WLAN) with A level of security and privacy like what's usually expected of a wired LAN. A wired local area network (LAN) is usually protected by physical security mechanisms (controlled access to a building, for example) that are effective for a controlled physical environment, but could also be ineffective for WLANs because radio waves aren't necessarily bound by the walls containing the network. WEP seeks to determine similar protection thereto offered by the wired network's physical security measures by encrypting data transmitted over the WLAN. encoding protects the vulnerable wireless link between clients and access points; once this measure has been taken, other typical LAN security mechanisms like password protection, end-to-end encryption, virtual private networks (VPNs), and authentication are often put in situ to make sure privacy. A research group from the University of California at Berkeley recently published a report citing "major security flaws" in WEP that left WLANs using the protocol susceptible to attacks (called wireless equivalent privacy attacks). within the course of the group's examination of the technology, they were ready to intercept and modify transmissions and gain access to restricted networks. The Wireless Ethernet Compatibility Alliance (WECA) claims that WEP - which is included in many networking products - was never intended to be the only security mechanism for a WLAN, and that, in conjunction with traditional security practices, it's very effective.

NEW QUESTION: 2 Which of the following items is NOT a component of a knowledgebased system (KBS)?A. Procedural codeB. Knowledge baseC. Inference EngineD. Interface between the user and the systemAnswer: AExplanation:Procedural code in a procedural language implies sequential execution of instructions based on the von Neumann architecture of a CPU,

Memory, and Input/Output device. Variables are part of the sets of instructions used to solve a particular problem and, thus, the data are not separate from the statements. Such languages have control statementssuch as goto, ifthenelse and so on. The program execution isiterative and corresponds to a sequence of state changes in a statemachine.*Answer knowledge base, refers to the rules and facts of theparticular problem domain.*The inference engine takes the inputs to the KBS and uses the knowledge base to infer new factsand to solve the problem. *Answer "Interface between the user and the system" refers to the interface between theuser and the system through which the data are entered, displayed,and output.
