NEW QUESTION: 1After almost five years as an elected Superior Court judge in Georgia, I am convinced that all significant problems in the administration of our judicial system can be summed up in one word: politics. Georgia judges are, purely and simply, politicians. Some are able jurists, but they all serve under a system that forces them to be more political than a judge should be. I learned early on that many citizens fail to make a distinction between a judge/politician and other breeds of politician. Trying to explain to a constituent that you want his support but that you can't do anything for him is, at best, difficult. Judges in Georgia have the worst of both worlds -- they must run for election like a county commissioner, but they are bound by law to observe a strict set of rules: the Canons of Judicial Conduct. The canons are voluminous and complicated; suffice it to say here that they make it impossible for an honest person to run a campaign and be true to them. For example, a candidate for judicial office cannot solicit funds or even ask anyone to solicit votes for him. All of this is done, in theory, by a committee of friends, but in reality the canons are ignored by most candidates. It was a sight bordering on the ridiculous this year to observe the candidates for the Supreme Court of Georgia. Some of them showed up at professional gatherings such as State Bar meetings with political buttons on their lapels, shaking hands feverishly with everyone in reach. During the campaign, one candidate was overheard remarking to a group at a political function that he needed to rush off to a "fund-raiser" in another town -- a blatant and fundamental violation of canons. No one makes any serious effort to enforce the rules of conduct that judges are sworn to live by. Within the past few years there have been flagrant violations of the ban on political activity by judges, but little, if anything, has been done about it. The highlighted word "them" refers to A. the canons of Judicial Conduct. B. political commitments. C. political supporters. D. judges in Georgia. Answer: A Explanation: Explanation/Reference: Explanation:
