NEW QUESTION: 2Which type of NAT is used where you translate multiple internal IP addresses to a single global, routable IP address?A. policy NATB. static NATC. dynamic NATD. dynamic PATE. policy PATAnswer: D

Explanation:
http://www.cisco.com/en/US/docs/security/asa/asa82/configuration/guide/nat_dynamic.html Task Flow for Configuring Dynamic NAT and PATUse the following guidelines to configure either Dynamic NAT or PAT:First configure a nat command, identifying the real addresses on a given interface that you want to translate. Then configure a separate global command to specify the mapped addresses when exiting another interface. (In the case of PAT, this is one address.) Each nat command matches a global command by comparing the NAT ID, a number that you assign to each command. Note The configuration for dynamic NAT and PAT are almost identical; for NAT you specify a range of mapped addresses, and for PAT you specify a single address. Figure 29-9 shows a typical dynamic NAT scenario. Only translated hosts can create a NAT session, and responding traffic is allowed back. The mapped address is dynamically assigned from a pool defined by the global command. Figure 29.9 Dynamic NAT Figure 29-10 shows a typical dynamic PAT scenario. Only translated hosts can create a NAT session, and responding traffic is allowed back. The mapped address defined by the global command is the same for each translation, but the port is dynamically assigned. Figure 29-10 Dynamic PAT
