NEW QUESTION: 1 A fully stated requirement with no missing information is _____. A. cohesive B. complete C. consistent D. current Answer: A

NEW QUESTION: 2 Which flash deployment is ideal for environments that need extreme database performance? A. Server cache B. Traditional storage C. All-flash array D. Hybrid array Answer: C Explanation: Explanation/Reference: Explanation: The major benefit of an all-flash array is the ability to deliver sustained levels of extreme performance at a lower price point than that of a storage system that employs spinning disk drives. For the most part, this means dramatic improvements in response-time performance (latency), or the time it takes to respond to each and every transaction processed in a database-driven application. For many applications, it is simply unacceptable to have any perceptible variance in transaction time that could impact the customer experience. In the financial industry, for example, stringent response-time requirements may be the subject of government regulation. Another use case for an all-flash array is when you need extreme data throughput (as measured in IOPS) but don't have a corresponding need for massive capacity to permanently house all of the incoming data. An all-flash array is the right approach in this type of environment. Reference: <http://searchstorage.techtarget.com/NetAppSponsoredNews/When-to-Consider-an-All-Flash-Array>
