NEW QUESTION: 1 A company is planning to use Amazon Elastic File System (Amazon EFS) with its on-premises servers. The company has an existing AWS Direct Connect connection established between its on-premises data center and an AWS Region. A security policy states that the company's on-premises firewall should only have specific IP addresses added to the allow list and not a CIDR range. The company also wants to restrict access so that only certain data center-based servers have access to Amazon EFS. How should a security engineer implement this solution?
A. Assign an Elastic IP address to Amazon EFS and add the Elastic IP address to the allow list for the data center firewall. Install the AWS CLI on the data center-based servers to mount the EFS file system. In the EFS security group, add the IP addresses of the data center servers to the allow list. Mount the EFS using the Elastic IP address.
B. Add the EFS file system mount target IP addresses to the allow list for the data center firewall. In the EFS security group, add the data center server IP addresses to the allow list. Use the Linux terminal to mount the EFS file system using the IP address of one of the mount targets.
C. Assign a static range of IP addresses for the EFS file system by contacting AWS Support. In the EFS security group, add the data center server IP addresses to the allow list. Use the Linux terminal to mount the EFS file system using one of the static IP addresses.
D. Add the file-system-id.efs.aws-region.amazonaws.com URL to the allow list for the data center firewall. Install the AWS CLI on the data center-based servers to mount the EFS file system. In the EFS security group, add the data center IP range to the allow list. Mount the EFS using the EFS file system name.
Answer: A
