NEW QUESTION: 1After the merger of two organizations, multiple self-developed legacy applications from both companies are to be replaced by a new common platform. Which of the following would be the GREATEST risk?A. Project management and progress reporting is combined in a project management office which is driven by external consultants.B. The new platform will force the business areas of both organizations to change their work processes, which will result in extensive training needs.C. The replacement effort consists of several independent projects without integrating the resource allocation in a portfolio management approach.D. The resources of each of the organizations are inefficiently allocated while they are being familiarized with the other company's legacy systems.Answer: C*Explanation:The efforts should be consolidated to ensure alignment with the overall strategy of the postmerger organization. If resource allocation is not centralized, the separate projects are at risk of overestimating the availability of key knowledge resources for the in-house developed legacy applications. In postmerger integration programs, it is common to form project management offices to ensure standardized and comparable information levels in the planning and reporting structures, and to centralized dependencies of project deliverables or resources. The experience of external consultants can be valuable since project management practices do not require in-depth knowledge of the legacy systems. This can free up resources for functional tasks. It is a good idea to first get familiar with the old systems, to understand what needs to be done in a migration and to evaluate the implications of technical decisions. In most cases, mergers result in application changes and thus in training needs as organizations and processes change to leverage the intended synergy effects of the merger.
