NEW QUESTION: 1A System Administrator has deployed an XGS. The NAP policy is configured to generate a local log event for every accepted network connection, for example, the Event Log object is enabled for the default Accept NAP rule. Due to the number of network connections, the administrator is concerned that this could take up too much disk space on the XGS. Which configuration should the Administrator change to ensure that this does not happen?
A. The Event Log object should be cloned and the new object should have the percentage of the total event storage limit for all logs set.
B. the Event Log object should be cloned and the new object should only have NAP event logging enabled and the percentage of the total event storage limit used for events should be set.
C. The Event Log object should be edited and the percentage of the total event storage limit used for NAP events should be set.
D. The Event Log object should be deleted and recreated with a new storage limit.
Answer: C
Explanation: By default, the maximum storage space for events is set to 2048 MB (2 GB). Events are stored in a database, which estimates the size of each event at 500 bytes, which means the database can store a maximum of 4,096,000 events. You can distribute the maximum events among different event types. When the event count for an event type exceeds 90% of the maximum event allocation, older event data is erased and overwritten. Note: You can adjust the maximum size using the following tuning parameter: Key: events.response.logdb.disklimitValue: 2048 The default value is 2048 MB (2 GB). To increase the maximum size to 4 GB, change the value to 4096. References: Implementation Guide for IBM Security Network Protection ('XGS for Techies') second edition, Version 2.0
