NEW QUESTION: 1 Which of the following statements is true regarding the service-port interface on a Cisco WLC? A. It is used for in-band management. B. It is used for out-of-band management. C. It is used for client data transfer. D. It is used for Layer 2 discovery operations. E. It is used for Layer 3 discovery operations. Answer: B Explanation: Explanation/Reference: Section: Considerations for Expanding an Existing Network Explanation: The service-port interface on a Cisco wireless LAN controller (WLC) is used for out-of-band management. A WLC interface is a logical interface that can be mapped to at least one physical port. The port mapping is typically implemented as a virtual LAN (VLAN) on an 802.1Q trunk. A WLC has five interface types: Management interface Service-port interface Access point (AP) manager interface Dynamic interface Virtual interface The management interface is used for in-band management, for Layer 2 discovery operations, and for enterprise services such as authentication, authorization, and accounting (AAA). The AP manager interface is used for Layer 3 discovery operations and handles all Layer 3 communications between the WLC and an associated AP. The virtual interface is a special interface used to support wireless client mobility. The virtual interface acts as a Dynamic Host Configuration Protocol (DHCP) server placeholder and supports DHCP relay functionality. In addition, the virtual interface is used to implement Layer 3 security, such as redirects for a web authentication login page. The dynamic interface type is used to map VLANs on the WLC for wireless client data transfer. A WLC can support up to 512 dynamic interfaces mapped onto an 802.1Q trunk on a physical port or onto multiple ports configured as a single port group using link aggregation (LAG).
